

Accuphase Laboratory

50 years ago, a small company called Kenonic Laboratory was formed in Japan, dedicated to making the best audio products under the brand name 'Accuphase' (a portmanteau of 'accurate' and 'phase'), moving to Yokohama and releasing its first three products (a preamp, power amp and tuner) two years later. Accuphase quickly became one of the best of the Japanese audio companies that dominated audio electronics in the 1970s and early 1980s, Kenonic became Accuphase Laboratory, and the rest is history.

Accuphase is about stability. The brand doesn't change its products on a whim, and the distinctive large gold analogue and digital electronics have a timeless appearance. More importantly, the engineering beneath those built-to-last exteriors is equally designed for longevity and consistency, as well as superb musicality and a performance that bespeaks quality.
